Background Briefing: HB 2551-Healthcare Data Breaches

Healthcare data breaches are on the rise. In the last year between 22.6 Million and 101.4 Million medical records and healthcare data files have been stolen, costing consumers more than $12 Billion. The reason this is concerning, beyond the consumer cost, is the ease with which these records can be obtained and the number of ways these records can be exploited, make healthcare data a prime target for continuing data theft. It is extremely likely that the incidence of healthcare data theft will continue to increase substantially each year.

Healthcare data records, in comparison with other types of personal records like credit card data and personal information, are extremely easy to access. Medical records are kept in many places: medical facility servers, electronic storage, and paper archives; in medical offices in both electronic and paper form; mobile devices used in the medical profession, such as laptops, flash drives and PDA’s; receipts and outpatient paperwork; offsite laboratories; insurance companies; and more. The large number of manifestations of healthcare data makes these records an easy target.

Further, these records are particularly valuable due to the number of uses available to people who have these records. These records can be used to steal identities and basic personal information, but more importantly (and more costly), these records can be used to obtain social security numbers and medical treatment.

Over the last 5 years, the number of large healthcare data breaches (breaches affecting more than 500 people) has increased by a factor of 80 to total 278 breaches per year. In the last 15 months between 26.2 million and 105 million records were compromised by more than 350 healthcare data breaches. The table below lists all of the major breaches that occurred between January 1, 2014 and March 15, 2015. This table includes data from government databases, news sources, and other databases showing data breaches.
